Authenticating an Early American Flag

Today there is no greater representative symbol of the nation than the American Flag. If one were to visit any museum in the world, one would not find a stars and stripes flag on display from the period of the American Revolution. For many years historians have been looking for such a flag. In 1988, Ron and Joyce Balsamo, Brimfield antiques dealers who specialize in folk art and oil paintings by deceased artists, joined the search for a period American Flag. They likened such a search to that of finding the "Holy Grail". To the Balsamos it was inconceivable that such a great nation had no original flag from the period of its beginning. This story details how Ron and Joyce found what may be one of the best original Revolutionary Period American Flags known, and what they did to authenticate it.

The Balsamos had been searching for an original flag since 1988. In 1991, they purchased a flag at a New York Armory antique show for $5,500 from Jerry Brill, a Virginia antiques dealer. Jerry had reportedly purchased the flag at a Virginia auction where it was found in a drawer.

Even though they had made several costly mistakes including a $6,000 blunder just two weeks earlier, the Balsamos were confident that this flag was an original Revolutionary American Flag. There was the flag hanging unpretentiously in Jerry's booth. While another potential buyer was contemplating the purchase, Ron acted on instinct, as many antique dealers often do, and quickly purchased the flag.

Authentication began almost immediately.

In 1973 the Smithsonian published the book Thirteen Star Flags - Keys To Identification. Chapter 2 notes that all the Revolutionary War banners hanging in museums today are made of silk. The book suggests that since silk was commonly used in making regimental and state banners, there appears to be no reason why the "stars and stripes" would not also have been made of silk. The Balsamos knew that their 13 star flag was made of silk. Interestingly, when the book was published, the Smithsonian had four 13 star flags from the Revolutionary War on display. They had no idea that these flags were not made in the 18th century. They were surprised to learn that these flags were made entirely with material that was first used in manufacturing in the 19th century. The Smithsonian no longer could claim any flags from the period of the American Revolution. However, this did not slow their effort to authenticate 13 star flags. The Smithsonian sent people to other museums to verify their properties as well. Dr. Langley, then Curator of American Naval History at the Smithsonian, described these findings as pitiful. He said that the most notable flag purported to be from a distinct Revolutionary War engagement was actually machine made.

Ron and Joyce decided to call Dr. Langley to ask him if he would assist in authenticating their flag. As they described the flag to Dr. Langley on the phone he immediately became interested and wanted to see it. He invited Ron and Joyce to the Smithsonian that afternoon. As Ron began to display the 13 Star Flag, Dr. Langley grew very excited, realizing that this flag was far greater than anticipated. This moment marks the beginning of a long journey of authentication and expert analysis. From early in 1992 to May of 2003, a research "team" subjected this flag to very critical scientific analysis to confirm period dating.

The Balsamos would learn that research cannot verify the date an artifact such as this flag was made. It could only prove what their flag was not. Soon the research confirmed that all the material used to manufacture the flag was that used in the 18th century.

Harry C. Kahn, of Rockhill Research and Fraunces Tavern, NYC, was the first expert to examine the flag. He said that it was not Centennial, that it was made of light silk and that "there was nothing in the flag that would be inconsistent with manufacturing techniques of the 18th century". He then suggested a textile and chemical analysis to confirm dating.

Dr. Langley arranged for Fonda Thomsen of Textile Preservation, to do the textile and chemical analysis. Fonda Thomsen opined that the silk was hand woven and that it had a similar fabric weave to other known 18th century banners. She confirmed that the single cotton thread sewn into the flag was for a repair and not part of its original construction. She also reported that the flag was finely sewn with French stitching. More importantly, however, she located remnants of tabs sewn into the flag heading. Fonda used a microscope to find these tabs. Dr. Langley knew that it was extremely important to locate these tabs as they were essential for 18th century dating. The tabs were used to affix the flag to a staff. The silk ties now sewn into the heading replaced the tabs which were permanently damaged and unseen by the naked eye.

Fonda Thomsen arranged for Nancy Pollok of the Getty Museum to do a chemical analysis of the paint used to make the 13 stars. Nancy confirmed that the paint included the chemical, barium sulfate, which confirmed 18th century dating. Ms. Thomsen then arranged for McCrone Associates to do a chemical analysis of the fabric dye, and to confirm all previous research for dating. The McCrone Associates report found no fault with Thomsen's and Pollok's conclusions. Additionally, McCrone reported that the fabric dye was composed of cochineal and natural indigo, which also confirmed 18th century dating.

Dr. Moeller joined the research team on May 20, 1994 in Keedysville, Maryland. Dr. Moeller is a revolutionary period research fellow, college professor and author. He believes that the flag may have been the property of the Marquis de Lafayette, and that reference to the flag may be found in a revolutionary period memorandum. The Balsamos reviewed the Marquis de Lafayette's memoranda, but did not find any reference to a 13 star flag, however their source did not include all of his correspondents.

Although science can only prove what the flag is not, it is not likely that any flag would survive the scrutiny that this special flag had to endure unless it was made in the last quarter of the 18th century. It is not a given that the regimental banners in many museums, although highly prized as Revolutionary Period, would survive the same scientific scrutiny. Moreover, Fonda Thomsen, one who has restored just about every banner from the Revolution in U.S. museums, has said that no banner has been so thoroughly examined for dating as this flag.

Early in their efforts to date this flag, Dale C. Anderson, said to be the most knowledgeable and reputable dealer in military artifacts, examined the Balsamos flag. He concluded that the star arrangement and the arrangement and color of the stripes confirmed the early dating of this flag. Dale did suggest that Ron and Joyce work with a specialist in thread analysis, which ultimately was the path the Balsamos took. Obviously, Ron and Joyce faced the complicated and difficult task of dating a 13 star flag from the Revolutionary War with intelligence and patience, utilizing many resources and many experts. Indeed today, they are more confident than ever before that their flag is the genuine article.

Ron and Joyce Balsamo are dealers in Brimfield at New England Motel.

History and Recent Sales of the American Flag

"Long May She Wave." "She's a Grand Old Flag." "Stars & Stripes Forever" All these quotations or lyrics raise awareness of our homeland by bringing attention to the one potent patriotic symbol we all embrace as our own - The American Flag.

When Americans think about 1776, images of a great flag may appear in their mind's eye. In fact, what is considered to be the first United States flag was raised in Somerville, MA on New Years Day in 1776. What most do not know is that General George Washington borrowed our flag's colors from the English flag, including the blue portion of the flag which is called the canton. As the War for Independence continued, the Grand Union's British canton was replaced by 13 white stars on a blue background. Flag lore notes that Washington invented this design at the Philadelphia home of his friend, seamstress, Elizabeth Griscom Ross, in June of 1776. The "Betsy Ross" flag, with the 13 stars in a circle, still carries "Elizabeth" Ross's name.

Congress approved the first US Flag on the original Flag Day, June 14, 1777. This flag had the 13 stars in a double-cross pattern that allude to the British flag. In 1818 a Congressional Act declared the stars, one to be added for each new state, be arranged in a series of rows. This eventually resulted in our 50-star flag in use since Alaska and Hawaii joined the Union in 1959.

Certainly one of the most significant flags to define our country's history is the flag found intact in the rubble of the World Trade Center. This flag was later taken to the moon and back. The symbolism of this gesture powerfully states the allegiance to the American flag. The flag ties us together as a nation - all races, all religions, and both sexes.

From a tiny lapel pin on the President of the United States to a flag flying from the back of a leather clad Harley rider, the flag exemplifies the beauty and the expressiveness of the American spirit. The range of possibilities for representation evokes some emotional response in all of us. Love it or leave it, the flag represents freedom to every American citizen.

In the antiques world, flags with significant documented provenance (history) always sell well. For instance, in October of 2000 Sotheby's Auctions in NYC sold a flag for approx. $50,000 + 15% buyer's premium. This flag was the first American flag made entirely of American manufactured materials having been manufactured in Lowell, MA by Middlesex Corporation Mill. At that time, Civil War General Benjamin F. Butler owned this mill. Butler brought the flag to President Lincoln for approval. Lincoln was assassinated 3 days later. Ames Stevens, great, great grandson of Butler, purchased the flag, and then gave it as a corporate gift to the Textile museum in Lowell, Mass. There have been flags that have sold publicly for more money, but these were flags from the Confederacy.

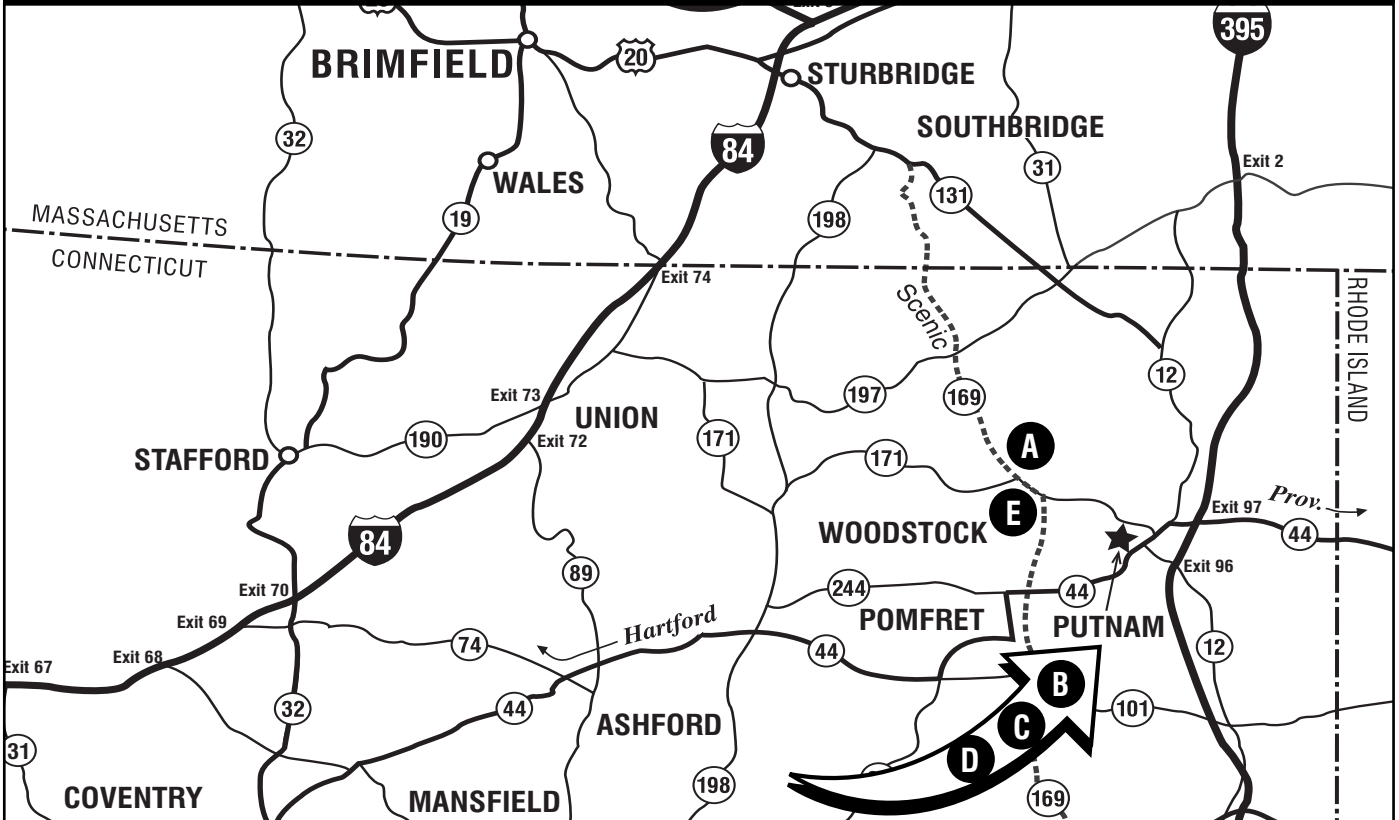

With patriotism at an all time high, Sotheby's has topped Jim Cyr's (Gray Maine Auctioneer) record of $163,000 recently. Sotheby's sold a hand-sewn banner decorated with a 13 star American shield for $262,500. This banner is believed to have been displayed at Washington's presidential inauguration in 1789. Other highlights of this particular collection included $47,000 for a 25 star flag commemorating Arkansas's statehood in 1836 and $32,862 for a 31 star American national flag said to have been used in the 1860 campaign of Abraham Lincoln.

The huge record prices often scare people into thinking their treasure might be worth loads of money. Before anyone gets too excited, be sure check out the internet sales, where lots of old flags sell between $1,000 and $2,500. While you are researching your particular flag, don't forget to take a look at or wear those nice old vintage flag pins.

For those who would like more information on collecting flags, check out the North American Vexillological Association (NAVA), PMB 225, 1977 N. Olden Ave. Ext Trenton, NJ 08618-2193. Their website address is www.nava.org
